RESEARCH INTERESTS & EXPERTISE

As an identity scholar, I study how people make sense of and reflect on their many different personal identities, work and non-work related. I examine how individuals perceive themselves, particularly through the roles they occupy (role identity) and the social groups to which they belong (social identity). Further, I consider what consequence their perceptions have for workplace behavior.

With this, I explore two broader questions: 1) What perceptions do worker's hold about their personal identities? 2) What are the workplace consequences and implications of those perceptions? I also consider these outcomes at different work stages, such as the organizational newcomer experience versus that of established organizational members.
